The relationship between physical activity and tic expression was investigated in 26 adolescent and adult outpatients. An ambulation/movement time (ACT) rating was made for each patient, and the interaction of the ACT and the presence or absence of tics was tested. Patients with tics showed a significantly longer ACT than non-tics, even when age and sex were controlled. Further, the presence or absence of tics was significantly related to the mean ACT for all patients. The results suggest that tics in Tourette syndrome are related to a physical activity deficit. An algorithm for comparing effects of piRNA biogenesis factors on transcript size control. Many small-interfering RNAs (siRNAs) activate RNA silencing as mediators of post-transcriptional gene regulation. By contrast, a minority of siRNAs with similar function also act as piRNA biogenesis factors, and a considerable portion of these pathways are poorly characterized. Because piRNAs have a special mode of biogenesis, we explored the feasibility of studying piRNAs biogenesis with an algorithm for comparing the effects of piRNA biogenesis factors on transcript size control based on the common mode of biogenesis. To validate our algorithm, we show that endogenous Drosophila piRNAs are defined as a subclass of the canonical mature-piRNAs (mpiRNAs) and that Drosophila Piwi-interacting RNAs (dpiRNAs), which are an exception of the canonical mpiRNA biogenesis pathway, are subclasses of piRNAs. We further introduce the algorithm to probe the effects of five piRNA biogenesis factors on transcript size control. The results show that these piRNA biogenesis factors affect transcript size control differently. Finally, we provide a sequence-based explanation for the differences in transcript size regulation. Our results underscore the potential of combining the availability of RNA sequencing data and the algorithms developed here in systematically studying the effects of piRNA biogenesis factors on transcript size regulation. 787 S.W.2d 663 (1990) 309 Ark. 560 Donald L. I use this code and with this code the output is as you want string[] lines = Regex.Split(OutputText, @"\s+"); string[] lines1 = Regex.Split(OutputText, @"\r\s+"); string[] lines2 = Regex.Split(OutputText, @"\r\s+"); but I want to use var and out put the string array into it. Any help guys, Thanks! A: Try this: var lines = Regex.Split(OutputText, @"\s+"); You need to escape \s: @"\s+" On Friday evening in the Senate, the question of whether a President can be indicted and tried was posed by Tennessee senator Lamar Alexander, a Republican. It has always been a safe bet that former president Bill Clinton will be walking through the Senate halls any day now, heading to a room that looks like a dentist's office, with a small glass window to look out of. (If you need a vision of what it looks like, watch "The Jerry Springer Show.") Any day now, you'll see Bill Clinton walking through the Senate halls. Any day now, you'll hear the sound of his step. Any day now, you'll have to take off your belt. Any day now, your cell phone will ring and you will hear the distant voice of Elvis telling you to "take it easy." Any day now, you'll pack up your career. But today is not that day. There is no tingling in the old tush. This is a much different Bill Clinton. He was recently interviewed by Ron and Donnie about the fact that he wasn't asked whether he thinks an indicted candidate should be punished by the voters, but not prosecuted. No! Ron and Donnie had to ask that question! There was no one else to ask, because no one else would even think to ask it. A majority of Americans have fallen in love with Bill Clinton. Hillary has grown long and lustrous. Their eyes have glazed over as he has walked through the Senate hallway, seemingly completely oblivious to what was happening. Mr. Know-It-All and Mr. Judge-Everything, as he has been described, has no idea what's going to happen. He is in for a rude awakening. Hillary Clinton is going to have to answer for 1cdb36666d
