So i shall have to pay to have a site survey done. It also turns out that the council can't put up building control until they are inspected. I must have been asleep for the last 6 years as i had not realised this. I do have a building certificate from a previous company who did my flat, the Planning Act says there is no need to get one for my house, but there are many other buildings on site, will a building certificate for my house be enough to stop them snipping trees, blocking off road access etc? Can i just get a plan (plan drawing) without the building control certificate? Sorry if this is an obvious question! What will be needed is a complete set of drawings, not just a plan. I believe that a plan needs the information as to what is to be built in each of the zones that come into the plan. Obviously this depends on the complexity of the plans, but I would imagine it has to be a full set of plans. The building control certificate is for a "working plan". If you are using that, then it should be adequate. I'd suggest that you get a full set of drawings as this will be the more important document for the council. I have the no objection from the council to the plans and they have given me permission for the site survey if I pay to have it done. I have got the full plans but one question is what is the difference between a building certificate and a building plan? I have to give an itemized list of all materials and supplies used in the construction of the house to the council within 3 months. From what I understand, a plan is the most detailed drawing available and is normally a complete set of everything that is to be built. A building certificate is the next most detailed 82157476af
